Boise, Idaho — A certain chain of farmers markets that they serve an affluent customer willing to pay high prices for unique and artisanal produce.

But last year, growers at one Capital City booth — Global Gardens, a community garden project run by the Idaho Office for Refugees — started quietly understanding that idea by accepting food stamps of their produce, both fresh and processed. The idea caught on, and this year hundreds of growers at the market will be at the booth stamp accessible, said Katie Painter, refugee agriculture coordinator with the agency.
